Much has been written and said of the resonant condition of a line, but up to the present time practice in the installation of plants and connection of motors, transformers, and other devices has not led to important interference from this source. What is called the resonant line, or distortionless line, can be obtained in two ways, either by the connection of capacities and inductances in series, or by their connection in parallel. In the first method of connection there is a very serious rise of potential at the respective terminals of the capacities and inductances, but with the parallel connection no such rise is found. The series connection of capacities and inductances is rarely used and, principally, on account of the difficulties likely to be encountered on account of these phenomena. The exact balance of inductances against the capacity of a line fifty or one hundred miles long, capable of supplying some thousands of kilowatts, would result in a voltage rise of not less than ten times the value of the normal; and, when one considers that this normal may be anywhere between twenty-five and fifty thousand volts, it is easily seen that such resonance may be formidable. Such an effect is sometimes actually encountered in the operation of switches on lines where considerable cable lengths are used in feeding highly inductive apparatus....
