Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Educational Bearings of Modern Psychology The reform of the teaching process is a somewhat difficult matter. All who are specially charged with the improvement of classroom practice will testify to the fact. The difficulty is excessive at the present hour because we have arrived at a point where tinkering with the various details of traditional procedure no longer gives a considerable result. Educational reconstruction must be made far reaching if it is really to become effective in a fundamental way. It must greatly extend the range of experiences which the school makes personal to the child and provide a more vital foundation for the acquisition of such skills as are eminently necessary in adult life. The modern program calls for greater vitality and breadth in the education of youth. Success in such an expansion of educational policy involves a radical change in point of view. The needed change in point of view will come more readily if the teacher recognizes the restricted field in which dominant teaching traditions have originated. In function the first schools were exceedingly narrow as compared with modern institutions. There is no human necessity for which the present educational system does not aspire to train young men and women. Its scope is as broad as human life; its field has the width of human nature. The earliest schools, those which set the first teaching traditions, were reading and writing schools. They taught only the formal arts associated with the printed or written symbol. The provision of broad and vitalizing first-hand experiences was no part of their task. Nor did they teach through an oral exchange of adventures, save in the...
