The great attention given to the study of Physical Chemistry, and the far-reaching importance attached to the interpretation of chemical phenomena in the light of modern theories, make it absolutely essential that more time be given in the college courses on General Chemistry to these mathematical demonstrations. Unless a clear and concise exposition of the methods of calculation is presented in the very first course of college work, the progress of the student is greatly hindered. On the other hand, too great a mass of mathematical data may impede rather than promote this progress. The aim, therefore, has been to limit these calculations to those subjects generally regarded as fundamental, and in which the student should receive the most complete and thorough drill. Such may rightfully constitute our Arithmetic of Chemistry. Of the many important subjects omitted, the greater number possess a theoretical bearing which brings them more properly into those courses following General and Analytical Chemistry or into the study of Physical Chemistry itself. The absence of mathematical training as a basis for the study of chemistry constitutes a widely prevailing defect in the education of chemists at the present day.
