Excerpt: . . . been drawn up, is comparatively small. Year by year the standard of the Examinations goes up, and in order to keep up the record of examination results, it is found necessary to increase the time devoted to each subject. Moreover, the larger Institutions throw their well-equipped laboratories open to evening students, and this increases the time required in subjects in which practical instruction can be given. Mathematics is frequently taught in two-hour lessons; Machine Drawing and Building Construction often require two hours a night on two nights a week; while Applied Mechanics and Steam, formerly (and still in small towns) taught in one-hour lessons, now occupy two and a half or three hours. The two opposing principles of Catholicity and Specialisation here assert themselves, and not a few of the defects of curricula arise from the difficulty of drawing a line between them. The position of this line is conditioned entirely by our estimate of the function of the Evening School in Technical Education, and in a voluntary system, impregnated with sentiment, that estimate is too often controlled by personal interests. A word on the influence of examinations, by a Central Authority, may not be out of place here. It is sometimes stated that they are incompatible with locally organised courses of instruction; but this arises from a misconception. It is unfortunate that in this country examinations have been allowed to dominate curricula. Inspection has not been so long instituted on an adequate scale...
