Excerpt: .want of liberality on these subjects. Mr. Moberly, said his sister-in-law, I thank you for your frankness; I might have accepted your proposal for Bertie, and repented when too late, had you kept me in ignorance of your principles. Knowing them as I now do, I cannot, dare not, commit the education of my boy into your hands. Unless I can have the boy constantly with me, replied Mr. Moberly, my promise that he shall be my heir falls to the ground. I am willing to adopt him as a son, and I offer you a home with him and me. I advise you to pause before you reject what is so clearly for his advantage, and so surely for your own comfort. I cannot pause, said Mrs. Moberly. Believe me, I appreciate your kindness, and I know how much I am giving up of worldly advantages, for Bertie as well as myself, but, my dear brother, there is a text in the Book which I try to make the guide of my life, that says, What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? At all events, said Mr. Moberly, if you lived with him, there would be fair play; your influence on these matters would be set against mine, and yours might carry the day after all, you know. I could not feel it right to subject his young mind to such counter-influence. Besides,...
